TheProductLawyers.com reports on an article by Starts at 60, discussing new technology that will help patients record their symptoms.

The article states that Ovarian Cancer Australia is encouraging women to use a new downloadable symptom diary to help track worrisome symptoms including pelvic or abdominal pain, swelling or bloating around your abdomen, incontinence or a frequent need to urinate, issues eating or feeling full after small meals, back pain, indigestion and nausea, bleeding after menopause, unexpected weight gain or weight loss, fatigue and changes in your bowel movements.

Keeping ovarian cancer symptoms in check is especially important now that many women have come forward saying that common household products such as Johnson & Johnson?s baby powder is linked to the disease. Over the last 45 years, numerous studies have found that women who use baby powder as a feminine hygiene product are more likely to develop ovarian cancer. These powders have been the subject of thousands of lawsuits filed by plaintiffs claiming that they have suffered from ovarian cancer as a result of its use. Johnson & amp; Johnson has maintained denial in these claims and has previously stated that there is no link between talcum powder and ovarian cancer. The company has never released a warning about the potential risks of its Johnson?s Baby Powder and Shower To Shower products.

Several plaintiffs have already been awarded millions of dollars in compensation and lawsuit numbers are continuing to grow. Most of the filed cases are pending in a Missouri federal court, while others have been filed in New Jersey, where Johnson & Dohnson is headquartered.

Banville Law has many years of experience fighting large pharmaceutical companies who have put dangerous drugs and devices onto the market, foregoing public safety for corporate greed.

The firm is looking to assist those who believe they have been directly affected by the use of Johnson?s talcum powder. Affected individuals may be entitled to financial compensation and legal action. Banville Law is currently offering free consultations to individuals who qualify.
