GrowUpSmart is a London based company that provides educational toys for children. The company has announced the official launch of their new collection of special needs toys, which are now available through their webshop. A spokesperson for the company states that the toys are not just designed for special needs children, but are generally great for promoting the use of senses in all children.

"Many of these toys are also popular among caretakers of elderly people," says Martin Reinhold with GrowUpSmart.

Reinhold states that the new lineup includes a balancing disc that is highly popular among children. The disc can be used for see-saws and balancing and is designed so that even small children can safely use it. Reinhold points out that the disc will not tip over and its design helps to train body control and a sense of balance.

"All of the toys in our collection are designed with education in mind," says Reinhold. "Our team works closely with suppliers to ensure that we are offering the best possible products for parents and child professionals."

He states that the company does not automatically offer big brand name toys that are popular with children but instead offers toys that carry a significant teaching aspect.

Another toy in the new lineup is the cactus toy which helps to teach shape and color differentiation as well as color matching. The company states that the toy can help to develop fine motor skills and tactile perception in children of all ages. It also helps with concentration and focus as well as vocabulary as children learn to pronounce the various different materials and game pieces. Different spheres and balls invite sensory experiences and children have a number of textures to explore as well.

GrowUpSmart offers a number of toys that are dedicated to special needs as well as those designed to promote fine motor skills and they have recently added a line of empathy dolls to help children learn more about themselves and those around them. More on all of the collections now being offered can be purchased from the company's official website.
