January 13, 2017 - PRESSADVANTAGE -

Mary Esther, FL ? Terence Gross of Gross & Schuster, P.A. is one of the top personal injury and wrongful death attorneys in Fort Walton Beach, FL. Just days ago, Gross had the chance to articulate his viewpoints on the tort reform and its underlying issues.

Tort can be described as an infringement on an individual's rights, typically involving personal injury, which results in a civil case. Throughout the last decades, numerous changes have been made to cases dealing with tort that in Gross' opinion, place average citizens in a huge hole.

Medical malpractice, car crash, hurt on the job: all of these injury prone disasters can of course lead to a civil case, but unfortunately the injured individual is set up to lose. More importantly, they can lose out on money. Medical malpractice caps are just one type of reform that inhibits an individual from getting a feasible amount of compensation after a medical mistake. Even clauses like worker's compensation immunity make it impossible for employees to sue a company after a manager or owner's negligent actions.

The most awful component concerning tort reform is that the insurance providers that are meant to assist the individuals wind up taking advantage of the case, while those harmed are left to deal with unrelenting problems. The regulations passed basically rob a person of a decent compensation amount after being injured, indicating that an insurance company can dish out very little in terms of cash. Sadly, the amount is never enough to cover all the costs associated with the case, injury, or pain and suffering. The Fort Walton Beach lawyer is concerned for the people, but understands that he must still develop methods to assist in any way possible.

It's ridiculous but it's something that we've had to deal with in many cases over the years," Terence Gross said. "We urge everyone to educate themselves on the issue so that they have all the necessary information if something like this happens."
