Fort Walton Beach, Fla.- Expert injury lawyer in Fort Walton Beach, Terence Gross of Gross and Schuster, P.A. has appeared on the WCOA Radio Show to articulate his worries concerning the status of death penalty sentencing in America.

"The current state of capital punishment makes it effectively useless," Terence Gross said. "Some states are abolishing it outright just because a criminal can leech on taxpayer dollars through the whole process."

Capital punishment is specified as the legal authority to kill someone as punishment for their criminal offenses. Lately Gross discussed just how capital punishment in Florida was in a state of change. The personal injury lawyer in Fort Walton Beach, FL, spoke on how appeals as well as mitigation were bogging down the justice system by delaying the sentencing process and preventing justice from being served.

The laws regarding Florida's capital punishment cases have a track record for transforming. Previously, judges held the authority to override a death penalty hearing; a method considered unconstitutional and also later on changed. The expert injury lawyer in Fort Walton Beach, FL, continues to improve in order to keep up with the changing laws.

?There are many ways a convicted murderer can escape execution or delay it for many years. Even the most heinous of crimes will meet opposition, and that?s something that gets taken advantage of,? Gross said.

The personal injury attorney specifies that with certified legal representatives and no appeals to the defendant?s competency or sanity, punishment could still be delayed for upwards of 10 years. Gross suggests a 3-panel capital punishment court including only experienced lawyers who are certified in death penalty cases. As Gross continues to educate the airwaves, so shall he continue to improve his legal practice to honor the town of Fort Walton Beach.
