"We want to help entrepreneurs to choose their startup," says a representative for the website. "By sending out this newsletter, we hope to give business minded people an idea of a type of business that they can run and hopefully, they'll start it up."

The newsletter contains ideas that are chosen by the staff of the Nugget.one website. Ideas are provided at random and then those ideas are looked at, with the best being chosen for display in the newsletter. Business ideas, according to the company, can range from software that controls robots to paint sports fields to hotel management software and many things in between.

"We never know what the ideas are going to be," says the company spokesperson. "We just know that they come in and most of them are really great. It's hard sometimes to tone them down to just a short list."

That short list normally includes up to 360 startup business ideas according to the company. In addition to their free daily list, the website also recently announced that they are offering a hand chosen business idea that is selected from submissions. The site urges those interested in starting their business, but who have no idea of what type of business they should begin, to sign up for the free newsletter which delivers business ideas via email every day.

The startup ideas encompass every imaginable market and the website provides information and resources for those who are starting a business. They offer information that walk entrepreneurs through the process of choosing a business, start it, and grow it until they are earning the income that they want.

The founders and operators of Nugget.one have years of experience and have begun several businesses themselves. They state that they have the skills and firsthand knowledge of startups needed to help others to be successful in their ventures in creating a monthly revenue stream.
