iProven is a company in Rotterdam, ZH, the Netherlands, that has set as its mission the development of the highest possible quality health products for in-home use, while complying with professional medical standards. They are proud to announce that they have worked with scientists from across the Netherlands to improve on the algorithm on their ear thermometer. It now matches biological temperature sequences, making it more accurate than ever.

Daniel Noordijk from iProven says: "We are committed to ensuring that our clients always get the best products. Our range of products for measuring body temperature, therefore, are fully recommended by medical professionals. In fact, many of them are used in hospitals and clinics. At the same time, we always stay up to date with new developments, so that we know our products meet the latest innovations."

Thanks to the Dutch developers, the company was able to make some small but significant changes to the cap of their thermometer. While these changes were minute, they did further increase its accuracy. Because many of iProven's clients are infirm, as well as the very young and very old, accuracy is of tremendous importance. Small temperature changes in people with a compromised or weakened immune system can indicate a medical condition that could be dangerous for them.

Those who have used the digital thermometer have praised it for its ease of use and its high accuracy. Time and again, they state how confident they have been about the results of their readings, and how much they trust the company in terms of providing the best product. "I absolutely adore this thermometer. I purchased this after my father was diagnosed with leukemia and we need to check the temperature often in order to keep a track on potentially fatal infections. It is a highly accurate thermometer, and I have used it even during my dad's hospitalizations. I love that it is very easy to use....," says one Amazon customer.

iProven currently has four different thermometers as part of its collection. All four have either a 4.5 or 5-star rating on Amazon. One thermometer has received nearly 3,000 unique reviews, and the other models are quickly catching up as well.
