Spring in the Air?s New Blog Discusses Cooking with Rose Hips

September 13, 2017

September 13, 2017 -
July 11, 2017, Miami, Florida - All types of roses have hips, from purple roses to red roses, and everything in between. However, there are some rose hips that are more packed with vitamin C than others, while some have been ingested for other purposes. Spring in the Air, a rose delivery service, gives advice on cooking with rose hips in its latest blog post.

The author of the post explains that rose hips have been used for centuries, sometimes to add flavor to sups and drinks, and other times to be used as elixirs. The post then delves into ways in which rose hips can be used today, along with a few suggestions for recipes.

Although the site is most often used to order a dozen roses, they are currently expanding their blog to give its readers a better understanding of the history and culture surrounding roses. Previous topics have included the development of long-stem roses and the meaning of rose colors, but this is the first post to discuss using roses as anything other than decorations.

Spring In The Air?s blog will ideally create more informed customers who are happier with their orders and who have a full understanding of the flowers they love. This includes finding uses for roses after they are taken down from display.
