New Blog from Spring in the Air Tells How to Improve a Dinner with the Right Centerpiece

September 18, 2017

September 18, 2017 -
July 11, 2017, Miami, Florida - From small family meals to birthday dinners, Thanksgiving banquets, and more, the centerpiece is one of the most notable decorations in the home. A good centerpiece lives up the table and serves as a conversation piece, and a bouquet of a dozen roses can do exactly that, or so claims Spring in the Air in their latest blog.

The company is best known for shipping long-stem roses to its subscribers, but lately has been offering advice and lessons on its blog. The most recent post gives instructions for creating seasonal centerpieces and which roses are right for certain dinners.

The blog?s author also offers advice on choosing the right centerpiece for the right dinner space. She states that some bigger rooms and tables may require two dozen roses, while more intimate spaces call for smaller bouquets. More information in the blog surrounds who is being invited to the dinner, the occasion, and more.

While many people do not put too much thought into the table?s centerpiece during their dinner, the author claims that it does deserve consideration since people will be looking at it nearly as much as they will be looking at their food. She hopes that her latest blog helps readers have better dinner parties in the future.

Spring In The Air?s blog is meant to create more informed customers who are happier with their orders and who have a full understanding of the flowers they love.
