Rip Toned Fitness is a fitness products company based in Las Vegas, Nevada. The company recently announced that their wrist wraps for weightlifting that have become so popular in the United States on Amazon are now available on the Amazon.es marketplace for customers in Spain.

Marks Pasay, a representative for the company says, "Our weightlifting wraps became hugely popular here in the United States and we wanted to introduce this product to the market of other countries."

Pasay says that since their initial release, the wrist wraps have gained mass popularity on the American Amazon website, with numerous reviews from satisfied customers around the nation. He states that since they were such a hit in the U.S., the company decided to release them in other countries, eventually making them available to all customers around the world.

Pasay says that the company has also released a video on YouTube that shows users how to wear wrist wraps properly. He points out that this helps them to avoid common injuries that can occur when lifting weights. The company's wrist wraps are the only ones that are currently endorsed by Kevin Weiss, world champion powerlifter, and they have been featured on numerous television networks including popular NBC, ABC, and Fox.

"They are very beneficial to lifters," says Pasay. "Not only do they help you to steady and balance your lifting to give you more benefit while doing your workouts, they help you to avoid injuries that can often be caused when lifting, particularly when you are not lifting properly."

The weightlifting wrist wraps by Rip Toned Fitness have been available on the Amazon marketplace for some time and they are now available on the marketplace for customers in Spain and Italy. Those interested in learning more about these or any other products that the company offers can find them online or visit them on their Amazon marketplace seller's page for a complete listing of the fitness and weightlifting products that they offer. The company states that they plan to release these and other products onto more global marketplaces in the future.
