October 25, 2017

October 25, 2017 -
The Law Offices of Kevin Cortright, based in Murrieta, CA, are proud to announce that they have continued to expand their blog on California workers compensation death benefits. They have recently published a new blog post that is part of an ongoing series. This was the eighth of its kind in this series.

Kevin Cortright himself says: "When a California employee dies from an on the job injury it can be one of the toughest types of workers' compensation cases to handle. There are numerous issues to determine who is a rightful dependent. It also happens at a time when a family has lost a loved one and it is an emotional time to deal with financial issues. Family members suddenly and often without warning feel the impact of the absence of the income of their deceased family member. My blog posts aim to shed some light on what needs to be done in these difficult situations."

For Kevin Cortright, the goal is to ensure that everyone is properly represented in cases of personal injury of any kind. From his offices in Murrieta and Palm Springs, he welcomes anyone who wants a free consultation in which a situation can be discussed. These consultations are no obligation and simply provide individuals with an opportunity to find out whether they have a case to be made. The information provided in the blog series also helps people to understand their case and the legal process better.

Those who have worked with the attorney in the past have been full of praise about their experiences. One client states on Avvo: "Mr. Cortright got me the workers compensation benefits I needed during a difficult time while I was recovering from my injury. He was able to get me temporary disability payments, good medical care, and in the end a great settlement. He and his secretaries go out of their way to guide you through the very convoluted workers compensation process."

People are encouraged to read the blog series on California workers compensation death benefits and, if appropriate, to contact the Law Offices of Kevin Cortright as soon as possible to schedule their consultation.
