The business philosophy of G. L. Hunt is unique and is set apart from its competitors. Team members associated with the firm are experienced and proud of the type of services they provide. For more than three decades, the culture of the firm has held firm for a strong sense of integrity. The experts ensure that the projects they work on are stabilized, enacting corrections which carry on into the future of the structure. On-site supervision is carried out through the entire project.

For most projects, one of three types of construction are utilized. The most common styles are the full basement, the crawlspace/pier and beam foundation and the slab. The full basement is the most common type when the soil and other environmental elements allow for deeper digging. It is the most stable and most supportive type. The pier and beam type is essentially a half basement and is often used when the structure has a full or half-second story. Slab foundations are often utilized when the soil is sandy or unstable.

Problems with the foundation of the structure can be caused by unstable soil, poor quality cement and water leaks. Flooding can also create issues, which show up as cracks, crumbling and bulging or uneven alignment. Repairing of foundations should not be attempted as a do-it-yourself project. The importance of quality foundations makes a professional contractor imperative.
