October 25, 2018 - PRESSADVANTAGE -

Perseverance Pest Control in Fishers, Indiana, has announced that it is time for homeowners to begin thinking about pest control for the winter months. The company states that as the temperatures get colder, pests begin to move inside homes in order to stay warm.

A representative for the pest control company says, "Winters in Indiana can be cruel and even pests that typically live outdoors will begin looking for warmer indoor temperatures as the outdoor temperatures begin to drop. Now is the time to act, during fall and before those temperatures get so low that those pests are going to be invading your home."

The company says that those who are interested can get more information about their fall pest control services at <http://ppc-indy.com>. The company website offers insights into pests that can often invade Indiana homes and gives an overview of their pest control services. They state that once temperatures begin to drop, bugs and mice, along with other wildlife, can make their way into a home in order to survive those colder temperatures. The company states that before winter arrives is the best time to ensure against those invasions.

"You don't want to wait until you have a pest control problem if at all possible," says the company representative. "If you do have a problem then now is the time to handle it. And, if you don't yet have pest problems in your home, now is also the time to take preventative measures to ensure that you do not end up with pests during those colder winter months."

Perseverance Pest Control Fishers says that they are ready to schedule appointments for homeowners who want to protect their homes from pest invasions this winter. The company states that homeowners can take a proactive approach to keeping pests out of their homes by checking around their homes for things like spider webs, mouse droppings and other telltale signs of an infestation. Those who are interested in learning more about effective ways to prevent pest infestations can visit the company on their official website where they offer tips and advice on keeping those pests at bay. The company states that mice are a common problem in homes during the cold Indiana winter months. They state that mice can enter into a home through the smallest crack or hole imaginable and say that once a mouse is found, it is likely that there is an entire infestation. The company recommends that homeowners plug up any holes around the home that lead to the outdoors with steel wool or wire mesh to keep those mice from entering.

The company states that there are a number of things outside the home that can draw mice to shelter. Things like wood piles and piled up trash and other debris around the outside of the home can tempt mice to seek shelter and once they have inhabited those areas, their next step is getting inside the home into the warmer temperatures. They point out that those who are interested can get more info on the company's website where lists of things to look for with regards to mice can be found.

Homeowners often try to protect their homes from pests during the winter months, but most pest control companies agree that depending on the level of risk or infestation, a professional technician is typically needed to remove those pests. Home owners who are not sure if they have an infestation or who believe that they may be at risk can contact Perseverance Pest Control to schedule an inspection.
