The Institute of Wedding and Event Design (IWED), a premiere provider of Wedding and Event Design courses, announced the popularity of their post, How To Correctly Drape a Column, on their website's blog.

"The post has seen a surge in popularity lately. Column draping has been positively trending in Google over the last two years and is one of the techniques students learn through the IWED accredited event designer program," says Nicole Blackwelder, one of IWED's Directors.

The signature program of The Institute of Wedding and Event Design is the event design course provides up to date design and style instruction, demonstrated skills, and more. The program is geared specifically toward hands-on instructions, and the building and development of design skills and techniques. The course information is from instructors that successfully run their own event design businesses.

"Students can learn online or offline, or both. Class sizes are intentionally kept small to accommodate 1-on-1 support and guidance from the instructors and to assure the most valuable learning experience for the student," Blackwelder adds.

Photos on the IWED Facebook Page illustrate the in-class, hands-on experience of students and showcase their newly-acquired design skills. Regular posts like this featured one provides information about new design trends, student experiences, and links to other valuable content. It also serves as a platform for group engagement for current students as well as former students and graduates.

On its website, The Institute of Wedding and Event Design introduces an Executive team with more than 40 years of combined event experience. The instructors all currently operate their own wedding and event businesses while also sharing their knowledge in the IWED classroom. In more than ten years of instructing and certifying designers, IWED indicates that worldwide, more than 1,000 students have graduated.
