November 07, 2018 - PRESSADVANTAGE -

As people head into Black Friday, 3 in 10 Americans feel bullied by store clerks.

It's almost Black Friday and millions of Americans will flood into stores to buy their big purchases for the holiday season. But, as a recent survey reveals, mounting pressure from store clerks to open store credit cards leaves many Americans feeling bullied while holiday shopping.

A survey conducted found that 31 percent – or three in ten Americans – feel bullied when the store clerk asks if they'd like to open a store credit card to receive a discount. And, customers aren't a fan of the pressure tactic: Almost half (49 percent) regret their decision to open a store card during the holiday season and more than half (57 percent) of shoppers say they avoid returning to the store where they felt bullied. The survey was conducted online among 1,320 Americans ages 18 and older.

More findings of store clerk bullying and the opening of store credit cards during the holiday shopping season, according to Miami adults: Roughly one-third (28 percent) have given into a store clerk's pressure and opened a store credit card during the holiday shopping season. When asked why shoppers regretted their decision to open a store credit card during the holiday shopping season many (36 percent) explained they already had too many credit cards.

Other reasons, people surveyed included: "I spent more than I originally intended" (19 percent) "I have too much debt already" (18 percent) "Opening the credit card had a negative impact on my credit score" (10 percent) ?Other? (15 percent)

The majority ? 70 percent ? of Americans explained the reason they did not regret opening a store credit card during the holiday shopping season was because they received a large discount on their original purchase. Although shoppers may feel bullied, they are also sympathetic for the position the store clerk is in. When asked if shoppers feel sorry for store clerks who have to pressure customers into opening a card 73 percent of Americans said yes.

Retail cards aren?t all bad. In fact, there are some very good ones that can save savvy shoppers money. Most can find reviews of the best store credit cards. However, they need to know which store card(s) they want before getting in the checkout line.
