Franklin, TN - Doug Gray has spent years providing business leadership coaching to professionals around the world. Now, he has a new blog where he is sharing his expertise in a way that can be conveniently accessed from anywhere in the world. His latest post focuses on the value of being an active listener.

The blog at <https://action-learning.com/about/> gives Dr. Gray a wider audience and allows him to provide advice to business leaders while also showing them the value of his courses. The current article explains that there are three levels of active listening.

The three levels are: Level 1: internal listening, (e.g., the client is looking inside, but the coach may be listening to how that story affects the coach); Level 2: Focused listening (e.g., the coach is laser-focused on the client's agenda); and Level 3: Global listening (e.g., the coach is focused on global cues including intuition, emotions, body language or the environment).

Dr. Gray explains that the skills can be taught or coached and that they are vital to be a successful leader in the business world. He and his team at Action Learning Associates regularly update the blog with pieces of advice meant to help executives.
