Evergreensstore, has released a new version of their digital baby forehead thermometer, just in time for the 2015 flu season. According to the CDC, flu season 2014-2015 was one of the worst to date.

As a result of mismatched H3N2 viruses, this past year's flu season continued to rage well into February 2015, along with an increase in the B virus.

Studies have shown that very young and old people are more susceptible to the flu than most. In order to help, Evergreensstore released an easier way for parents to determine if their child has a fever, one of the key symptoms of the influenza virus.

Children up to four years of age had the second highest rate of hospitalization during last year's flu season. Children are often more seriously affected than adolescents, teenagers, and young adults. During the 2014 flu season, nearly 50 out of 100,000 babies and toddlers were hospitalized due to the severity of their symptoms.

"We wanted to make it easier for parents to keep a more accurate eye on their children's temperatures, in an effort to keep the flu at bay," says the spokesperson for Evergreensstore.

Checking for fever is often the very first step when it comes to detecting the flu. This new digital thermometer works as an ear thermometer as well as forehead thermometer, making it the perfect temperature gauge for children and adults alike. It also comes with a 6-month warranty.

"Being able to check my 6 month old baby's temperature with the same thermometer that I use on my teenager is great. We just need the one thermometer, which makes it so much easier to know when someone needs to see the doctor," says Linda, mother of three in Texas.

The Evergreensstore thermometer relies on the latest infrared technology to give an accurate reading with a one-button press, a comfortable alternative to many options, particularly painful rectal thermometers. Consumers can learn more by visiting Evergreensstore on Amazon.
