Steps were taken quickly when in one week they were receiving more calls than usual, most of which were suspected bat problems in the attic. Upon further probing, they determined that a warning should be issued to the public and that additional staff be taken on to help humanely remove the bats from the homes of these callers.

The owner of the Critter Squad, James Catchings, said that despite the mania surrounding the bat problem, callers seemed to be very composed as they listened to him and his staff explains the dangers of the presence of bats in the attic. Armed with the right information, this study demonstrates that the company responded quickly and thoroughly, and the public was immediately made aware of the bat problem and the dangers of an existing infestation. The study also made it obvious that cooperation has led to collaboration over new innovations for effective bat removal.

Most often, people may just view a bat problem purely as a bothersome problem to get rid of. However, it is more than that. In the three paragraphs to follow, we will highlight some of the important reasons why you need to address a bat problem right away.

To be fair, bats are a beneficial part of the food chain. They are a natural form of pest control because they feast on insects, including those that can damage crops. However, bats are also a part of the diet of owls, raccoons, opossums, falcons, hawks and other meat-eating predators.

However, when they invade the home, there is no benefit; there is only danger. Bats can very often be rabid. Those who have the misfortune of being bitten by a bat that has rabies, they can be infected with it. Immediate medical attention can prevent it from becoming fatal. This is why people should never try to handle a bat problem themselves and call the professionals.

Bats are also associated with rabies and histoplasmosis. This occurs if a person breathes in a type of spore in bat droppings or fertilizer made from it. People in certain types of jobs may be more at risk than most others. For example, farmers may be potentially exposed, since bats frequently choose barns as a habitat.

It cannot be emphasized too strongly that if a bat problem exists in the home, do not attempt to remove them. The Critter Squad is well qualified to step in and do it right - and safely.
