Band directors, choir directors, and orchestra directors all know that their students love going on musical field trips, playing in parades, and traveling for performances. While these events are a great way for students to gain experience traveling and performing in front of large audiences, many music directors are fully responsible for the logistics of the trip, as well as for the students themselves. This creates high-pressure situations for directors as they try to manage all these responsibilities. Instead, music directors should be able to focus solely on their students and on the performance at hand. Recognizing the pressure that many music trips can put on directors, Peak Performance Tours can help any choir, band, orchestra, or musical group travel, plan music workshops, participate in various music festivals, travel to contests and meets, perform in parades around the country, and plan a travel tour of any size.

Just like with other class subjects, sometimes a field trip, or a musical performance in this case, is the only way to teach students certain skills. Being able to read music, play in unison, hit the right notes, and carry out other technical skills is a very important quality for any musical student, but being able to perform and engage a crowd is just as important. Unlike teaching a student how to play a new musical piece, turning a student into a confident and successful performer requires exposure to new audiences outside of the classroom. This type of music travel can either be performative, with the group participating in parades, contests, or concerts, or it can be educational, with the group traveling to music workshops. Either way, Peak Performance Tours will help any group get there by creating an entire travel itinerary that matches any budget or goals that they may have. "Peak Performance Tours is the best thing going in group travel," says Chuck S., a band director in Virginia. "The tour guides are responsive, helpful, and flexible. On a Peak Performance trip I can do two things I never could before: spend the majority of my time actually being a teacher for my students and I can actually enjoy the trip myself."

Besides gaining valuable experience with performing in front of large audiences, musical trips are a good way to teach students how to act in a professional environment on and off the stage. Although traveling can be fun and those who go on the trip should enjoy themselves, it is important that the students understand that once they step in front of an audience they are no longer students, but performers instead. Taking students on trips where they have to learn how to manage this shift is a critical step in their career development and will help them gain confidence in their abilities. A Peak Performance Tours trip will also give students the opportunity to interact with other performers, bands, choirs, orchestras, and directors and will give them a sense of identity in the musical world. Peak Performance Tours is an easy, convenient way for directors to take their students on important trips without sacrificing their teaching abilities or breaking the bank. When planning a trip with Peak Performance, directors work closely with the company to make sure that the trip is exactly what they want. This way groups don't have to waste money on aspects of the trip they don't want, while everything they do want is included. On top of that, Peak Performance Tours has a reputation of planning trips for groups that have gone on to become very successful. This status allows the company to reserve exclusive festival applications, book famous music venues, and hire acclaimed musical mentors. All these qualities are just few of the many perks that those who book Peak Performance Tours will experience.
