Columbus, OH (March 7, 2019) - Columbus Windows & Siding has recently announced the importance of replacing roofing felt with synthetic underlayment on residential and commercial properties. Roofing felt is designed to be a roofing barrier between the roof deck and the roofing materials that is installed to protect the building from moisture. The product can also reduce exterior noise. Synthetic roofing underlayment is considered to be the latest innovation in the industry because it has a longer lifespan and a higher level of durability. Technicians at Columbus Windows & Siding recommend the product to their customers because it's constructed with long-lasting polymer and is stronger than felt. Not only is it easier to install on the roof deck, but it's also impervious to moisture for more weather protection that reduces the risk of leaks and can be worth the investment.

The material is available in large rolls or as peel and stick panels. Synthetic underlayment is also more efficient in insulating the building and dampening sound to create a quieter interior setting. It also weighs less compared to felt, which makes it easier for roofers to install. The material is considered to be the next step towards offering more protection on residential properties to reduce the risk of water damage that can occur throughout the year.
