

JGM Properties Answers Questions About Leasing Office Space

August 27, 2015

August 27, 2015 - PRESSADVANTAGE -

JGM Properties in Bloomington, MN, has recently begun gathering a list of questions that clients ask them when considering leasing, and have shared the answers to those questions for future clients. The company has been leasing commercial real estate for a number of years.

Eli Russell of JGM Properties recently stated, "We know that people have questions when it comes to leasing office space in Minnesota. We want to answer those questions and urge businesses to reach out to us if they feel that we can be of any assistance."

JGM Properties, Inc. is a family-owned and operated commercial management company, founded in 1980. They work to ensure that all clients are completely satisfied with their experience, and want to stress that there are questions that should be asked before renting any office space.

One of the most important questions relates to space. "You have to know how much space you're going to need, otherwise you could end up paying way too much or being cramped in a space that completely negates productivity," says Russell. Russell states that the general rule of space is around 150 square feet per employee.

Another question that the company stresses should always be answered, is where your business should be located. Location is after all, the number one consideration in real estate, and can make or break a business. The company stresses that location is a critical consideration. In the wrong place, a business may not get the customers that it needs.

JGM Properties urges any business owner that is interested in leasing office or other commercial space in Minnesota to contact them. The company offers a wide range of services, and can help business owners to determine where their business should be located, and whether leasing is the better option to buying for each business owner's unique needs.
