April 30, 2019

Savannah, Georgia - April 30, 2019 -
The prominent personal injury attorneys from, The Brown Firm of Savannah, Georgia, are pleased to announce they have just released an article titled ?Why You Should Not Represent Yourself In Your Georgia Motorcycle Accident Case.?

Harry Brown Jr., DC, JD, who leads the firm, said, ?All too often, those who have been injured feel like they should represent themselves. However, the law is very complicated, and even the support of family throughout the case may not be enough to argue and win the damages a strong advocate might advise. Worse, if they fail to collect evidence, or miss a deadline, they may face certain disappointment.?

A victim injured in an accident may feel they have the best case possible and think they will have their say in court to tell the world their story. However, many personal injury cases do not go to court at all; most are settled out of court. In fact, just over 95% of cases in the US are settled out of court, which means that cases are concluded by means of negotiation. Those in this situation may wish to read the blog here to learn more.

Anyone who has been up against a touch negotiator knows the feeling of being out-argued and caught off guard, and perhaps conceded things they might not have done if they had more experience negotiating. Even those experienced in arguing just about anything can find themselves at a loss against someone with an intimate knowledge of the law. Legal negotiation is an art form, and lawyers practice this day in and day out at a level few others can ever hope to achieve.

Since the law is complicated, even most lawyers can?t know it all, which is why they constantly research and learn every day they are on the job?even after all their years of formal education. It is important for those involved in an accident to contact a firm that specializes in this area. The Brown Firm offers free consultations for those who have been injured as a result of another?s negligence, and are able to hold a complimentary review with their lawyers in the Savannah, Atlanta, or Athens offices.

One person up against a team of lawyers with decades of experience between them can feel like a very tough and lonely position, even if the law is on their side. The Brown Firm recommends that anyone who has been injured in a motorcycle accident in Georgia should contact an experienced motorcycle accident lawyer straight away as even a small delay could be costly. The firm affirms that, ?Even though we are a law firm, we are also in the customer service business.? They understand that each and every client has their own specific goals?some will focus on getting proper medical treatment, others will want to be compensated for time missed from work, and many will want the funds to repair a damaged vehicle or property.

The Brown Firm?s unique customer service approach sets them apart from other Personal Injury attorneys. They take the time and effort to evaluate their client?s unique situation and establish the best approach based on their needs, and they are there to protect their client?s interests so the injured and their families can concentrate on their health and recovery.
