July 18, 2015 - PRESSADVANTAGE -

Academic Muse, a company in Sacramento, CA has released new information to help academic writers beat through the writer's block. Academics know how difficult it is to write an academic paper, not because they don't have the skills and knowledge, but because words simply don't seem to materialize in the right order at the right speed. As can be seen on <http://www.academicmuse.org>, beating writer's block is just one of the issues they deal with, and academics are invited to download the range of free eBooks to get help with their writing.

"Writer's block is just one of the many things that can get in the way of an academic paper, but it is a major one," says Alan Klima from Academic Muse. "We have various tools available that academic writers can access to avoid this problem. Our free to download eBooks and articles are a great place to start. Additionally, we encourage academics to join our writing community to get even more help and resources."

The writing community is designed to help writers maintain the momentum needed for a regular writing practice. This ensures they are able to achieve high quality writing and improve even more over time as well. It helps participants to stop worrying, struggling or having to work for hours and hours on the same piece. Most importantly, it helps to break through the writer's block, ensuring they can not only finish the work they need to do, but have a life as well.

"My love in life is to see people say yes to writing, make the great choice, and be put in the right conditions that will make that choice happen again and again, continuously over time," adds Alan Klima. "Then the pages and the creativity and the momentum add up."

Writers are encouraged to join the boot camp and writer's community on <http://www.academicmuse.org/bootcamp/>. Further information is provided here on the benefits of joining and the topics that are covered in the community. Ultimately, the aim is to help writers break through academic writer's block once and for all.
