Dor-Mar HVAC is pleased to provide the best help possible to all its customers, and that includes advice on their website to keep their furnaces running better, and for much longer than they might without the proper maintenance. It's a harsh reality that equipment such as a new furnace can be incredibly costly, so it only makes sense that the average homeowner would want to do everything that they could to prolong the life of their furnace. Fortunately, there are a few things that a homeowner can do to ensure their furnace keeps running year in and year out at maximum capacity without problems.

One of the most important things to remember is the importance of air filters when it comes to the furnace. The more an individual runs their furnace, the more time dirt has to build up on filters within the HVAC system. Filters need to be regularly checked and replaced to ensure that trapped dirt and debris is not being released back into the home, as well as to ensure that the furnace is running as efficiently as possible.

In that same vein, it is important to be sure that the furnace itself is cleaned on a regular basis. This includes the vents and the ducts of the furnace. All the dirt and dust that builds up on filters builds up on and inside the rest of the furnace as well, so to ensure that it keeps running efficiently and to prevent potential issues, it needs to be cleaned. Having an HVAC technician perform this cleaning can be a good idea, especially if a furnace has a lot of complex duct work.

One of the biggest problems that can occur with a furnace is issues with the ducts, whether these are clogs of dirt in the duct system or small cracks or holes that may appear in the ducts, which necessitate their replacement. Because it is the ducts that allow for the passage of air, that air needs to be able to freely move through them.
