July 05, 2019 -

Bristol, UK, based success coach, mentor and entrepreneur, Atif Javid, has published a report for entrepreneurs and business owners on the benefits of systemizing business processes.

Many entrepreneurs fall into the trap of taking on too many tasks and participating in too many processes related to the delivering of products and services by their businesses.

Whilst this is acceptable when starting off in a new business, as resources can be limited, and the entrepreneur may want to learn all the important facets of their newly formed business, continuing down this overly involved path over the long run is not advisable.

For an entrepreneur, the common premise behind forming and running a business is to have financial freedom as well as the freedom of having control over their own personal time and schedule.

By being overly involved in their business and by making their business over-reliant on themselves actually ends up giving them none of the freedoms they originally sought. All they have is another job where they are making money in exchange for their time.

This report received coverage in Yahoo Finance:

For attaining the freedoms and not becoming a bottleneck in the growth of their business, an entrepreneur should look at various processes and systemize them in such a way that the business processes can be delivered by employees, suppliers and software applications without the continual involvement of the entrepreneur.

Not only does this approach empower the employees, but this also frees up the entrepreneur to focus on more productive tasks related to the business and enjoy more free time for personal pursuits.
