

A Survey from an Alpharetta Staffing Agency Goes Over Tight Labor Market Keeping Upward Pressure on Wages

Alpharetta, Ga. ? Good talent is hard to find, and the tight labor market is leading some employers to wage bidding wars over talent. But many wonder how much money is enough to convince an employee to turn down a job offer and stay with their current employer.

In a recent survey, Express Employment Professionals, an Alpharetta staffing agency, posed that question to job seekers and also asked employers how much would need to be offered to a star employee to stay with the company. On average, the survey found that employees want more than employers are willing to offer.

Job seekers were asked that if offered a new job if a pay increase, would it take to stay with current employer. Employers were asked that if a star employee were offered a job with another company, if a pay increase over their current salary or wage would be offered to retain said employees.

Overall from the survey given by the Alpharetta temp agency, 57% of employees want a raise of more than 10%, while only 30% of employers would be willing to offer more than 10%, even to a star employee.

?It has never been easier for workers to jump between jobs,? said Bill Stoller, CEO of Express. ?And because workers are so mobile, there?s less fear about leaving a ?good job? for a pay increase. If the new job doesn?t work out, there are plenty of other employers eager to hire. Businesses have to keep fingers on the pulse of the local economy, or they risk losing the talent wars.?
