DogGear strives to know anything and everything about dogs and their care. As such, they conduct constant research not just to find the products dogs love and supplies that keep them healthy, but also about the various goings-on within the canine world. It has recently come to the company's attention that five new cross breeds have emerged and received official names. These new breeds are the Goberian, the Golden Chow, the Shorgi, the Corman Shepherd, and the Chusky.

The Goberian is a cross between the Siberian Husky and the Golden Retriever. They are medium in size and possess thick coats that typically come in shades of tan, black, brown, white, or gray. These dogs are intelligent and high-energy; as such, they require spacious homes, a minimum of an hour's worth of exercise each day, and thorough socialization and training.

The Golden Chow crosses the Chow Chow with the Golden Retriever, and comes in a wide array of personalities and appearances. However, they are all generally fluffy, as well as smart and diligent. While this breed can make a stellar pet for families, they will require efficient socialization and training.

The Shorgi combines the Shih-Tzu and the Corgi. They usually take after their Shih-Tzu parent facially and their Corgi parent in terms of body shape. A medium-sized breed, their coats are medium-dense and come in red, fawn, or brown. While they can live in apartments, they need regular 30-minute walks and lots of attention to thrive.

The Corman Shepherd crosses the German Shepherd with the Corgi, creating a highly energetic and intelligent breed. They can make an excellent pet for the family, so long as they are well-trained. They are best-suited to be an only dog.

The Chusky is half Chow Chow and half Husky. They are marked by their pleasant demeanors and cushiony coats that come in a wide range of textures and colors. They thrive in homes in colder areas, as well as with owners who give them a lot of exercise and thorough training.
