August 26, 2019 - PRESSADVANTAGE -

Greenville, South Carolina based Whole Life Entrepreneurship (WLE) is pleased to announce that they now conduct virtual summits to help family members succeed in their business while maintaining a harmonious relationship with one another. Their virtual summits are designed to help business-owning families achieve a healthy balance between their business and household responsibilities.

As noted on the company's website, at wlemission.com, the WLE process focuses on removing barriers to hard conversations so that families can gain more joy and fulfillment while running their business. By improving conversational and listening skills, WLE believes that family members can collect the data needed to make better decisions for the company. In addition, the company states that families will be able to grow and sustain their business without sacrificing their personal relationships with one another by living a more balanced and holistic life. Attendees may sign up for one of WLE's virtual summits and unlock the secret to managing their business and personal lives. They will also be provided a 90-day strategic planner and coaching model that will help them grow, both personally and professionally.

Whether you're an entrepreneur struggling to take your business to the next level, or a partner who feels unfulfilled in your relationship and in the dark about the business that your life revolves around, you can regain the connection, communication, and joy you once had through Whole Life Entrepreneurship," says Adam Anderson, founder of WLE. He explains that the online summit will teach attendees how to amplify success without having to work harder and longer hours at the risk of losing their partner. At the same time, the summit will also help life and business partners to eliminate the feeling of being unsupported and lonely as they commit to this unique lifestyle. Anderson further states that attendees will learn how to effectively balance their business, passions, and personal relationships. To learn more about the virtual summit, WLE recently published a short introductory video, which can be viewed here: wlemission.com/1110-2/.

Furthermore, Anderson points out that couples in entrepreneurial relationships face a different set of challenges when compared to other types of relationships. He explains that entrepreneurial partners see the world through a different set of eyes, which is why this type of relationship needs tailored solutions other than what is typically suggested by relationship experts. Entrepreneurial partners are often surrounded by a multitude of issues, so it is crucial to develop the right skills to maintain this type of relationship. Some of these issues include poor time management, a lack of understanding between family members, a high level of stress, and so on.

"Most of our clients feel like they have no one to talk to and are all alone in their struggle, since their partners do not understand what they are dealing with. To avoid conflict, they either ignore the issue or pretend everything's okay, even if it's not," says Anderson. However, even though businesses can be one-sided, relationships cannot "since it takes two people to make a relationship work. He says, "We also went through the same stage, but when my wife and I started to put in the effort to understand and support each other, we saw major results. This is the reason why, today, we help entrepreneurial families just like us as they bring their business and relationship into harmony."

He continues that there is no reason for people to doubt the course of their relationship based solely on how little their partner is at home. He says that nobody should feel guilty for pursuing their passion and working hard to achieve their dreams. "Understand that you're not fated to a life in which you have no control, yet you assume all the risk and are forced to live out all the consequences of someone else's choices, for better or for worse. There is a way to have a strong business and a strong relationship, all at the same time," affirms Anderson.
