Walla Painting, based in Carmel, IN has announced that winter is not only a good time to do interior house painting, but that there are actually many benefits to getting it done during that time as well. This respected contractor has been serving the painting needs of residential customers in the Carmel and Greater Indianapolis, Indiana areas for many years now.

Company owner, Jonathan Walla, discussed winter interior painting benefits further by saying, "Many of our customers are just starting to realize the benefits of getting the interiors of their homes and business painted during the colder months. For one, it's a natural slow period for many painting companies so seasonal discounts often apply. That also allows us to be more flexible when we schedule jobs so we can better accommodate our customers' needs."

Low humidity and moisture in the air are other benefits of winter painting that Walla mentioned. He says that with less of these elements in the air the freshly applied paint dries and sets up faster. This results in an interior paint job that resists premature cracking and peeling much better than when home and business interiors are painted during warmer months.

Walla also noted that many customers of theirs in the past had reservations against getting the interior of their homes painted in the winter. This was because of the fumes latex and oil-based paints emitted. Since most homes in Carmel are closed up tight during the colder months, this meant that poor air circulation resulted in painting fumes lingering inside a home longer than normal. People often complained of feeling dizzy, nauseated, and getting headaches because of this. He says all that has changed with the introduction of low VOC paints into the home improvement marketplace. These paints do not give off the strong vapors that their oil-based and latex counterparts do. The owner stated that most of their customers can barely even smell the fresh low VOC paint that they put on just a few hours after it's been applied.

He also says there is a lot more that goes into their interior painting jobs than just applying paint. Walla stated the company's veteran painters are meticulous when it comes to prep work. They will sand where necessary and then tape over and cover every item in a room so no paint goes where it's not intended to. Their seasoned crews are also experts when it comes to doing tricky trim and corner painting too. Walla also mentioned that all the paint products that they use are manufactured by the most reputable company names in the industry.

Walla Painting is known for doing a lot more types of painting than just interior work. One of their other specialties is exterior house painting. They also specialize in cabinet painting and they even allow their paint crews to be hired for a day to complete any odds and ends painting tasks that their customers require them to do. Walla says they are also a fully licensed and insured painting contractor that has received much recognition for the quality of their work. This includes being recognized by Angie's List with a Super Service award in 2018. Walla also stated that they never consider any type of residential painting project to be too big or too small for the company to take on.

The owner encourages those who would like more information on winter interior painting to contact Walla Painting. This can be done by phone, email or by filling out the quick contact form on the company website. Walla mentioned that the winter months are also a great time to get together with their staff to start preplanning any painting projects that customers want done in the busy spring season.
