Those at Bio Clean of Utah stress the importance of hiring a reputable company to clean up after any area of a home or business has been saturated with water. Basement flooding, water pipe breaks, and other incidents that produce standing water in a structure can present big problems in both the near and long term if not properly handled.

Company owner, Daryl Olsen, had this to say about why they are a reliable Park City water damage cleanup option, "When you experience a bad water leak, a pipe break or other flooding at your home or business, it cannot be stressed enough that a thorough water cleanup needs to be done to remove 100% of the moisture from the saturated area. Failure to do this can lead to mold buildup, costly structural repairs, and carpet replacement in the near future. Our company never considers any water cleanup project to be done until the affected area is completely dry and there is no chance for future mold growth in that area. That is how we give our customers peace of mind that they will have no future problems after any water damage incident that we resolve for them."

He went on to say that highly rated water cleanup companies like theirs attack water buildup problems in a home or business in several different ways. The first way is that any water cleanup project should be done by well-trained and experienced techs. The company owner says the importance of this should never be underestimated. Olsen also added that expert water cleanup companies use the latest and best equipment to get the job done. That includes wet/dry vacuums with powerful suction and air blowers that penetrate deep into the padding of carpet and even into the smallest cracks between surfaces. The owner says their water cleanup arsenal also includes sophisticated mold remediation equipment. He went on to emphasize that a good water damage cleanup company knows what chemicals to use and where to place them to inhibit future mold growth.

The owner also added that there really is no good reason not to take the time to find a reputable professional service like theirs to clean up water-saturated areas. He says not only do they do a great job at this type of work but they also charge reasonable prices for it. Olsen says many times their water cleanup services are even covered under a person's homeowners' insurance. That results in the homeowner having to pay little or no out of pocket expenses. He says they will also help coordinate water damage insurance claims with a customer's insurance company so that water cleanup project moves along in a timely manner.

Olsen cited a recent job they were called to do as an example of what can happen if a person or business hires the wrong water damage cleanup company. This particular job involved their water cleanup techs going to a home to finish a job that was never completed properly by the original company that was hired to do it. He says the previous company made a good effort at drying up the water-saturated area in the home but they made some big mistakes too. The biggest mistake that the company made was they failed to remove a vapor barrier that was used to do the job. During the water cleanup project that vapor barrier had become quite wet. The company owner says this pretty much defeated the purpose of everything else the company did. That was because this mistake resulted in some structural damage and caused mold to buildup in the area in the area where the vapor barrier was left. Olsen noted that something like this happening on a water damage cleanup project is pretty much inexcusable.

Olsen finished by saying that good water damage cleanup companies like them also have an excellent reputation with business watchdog services such as Yelp.com and Angieslist.com. He advises that those in need of water damage cleanup check these services before choosing a company to do this type of work for them.
