Wilton Manors, Florida based RMS Accounting recently published an informative article on year end tax planning to help people uncover tax planning opportunities to reduce their 2019 taxes. It primarily focuses on a number of significant changes made to the tax law and how these changes can improve someone's tax situation. Learn more here: Fort Lauderdale Accountant.

As noted in the article, the first step people should take in tax planning is to identify the right time to factor in itemized deductions and standard deductions when they will do the most good. Finding the right time to activate specific types of deductions can significantly reduce the total tax value. A good example is to stack medical expenses into the years that they will exceed 10% of AGI to get the maximum tax benefit.

It is important to note that the amount of tax is dependent on the taxpayer's income bracket and, for any additional income, a marginal tax rate is being applied. A great way to avoid additional taxes is to delay income or accelerate expenses in order to reduce the amount of taxable income, says Steven Weil from RMS Accounting. He points out that delaying income even, if it will be taxed at the same rate in the future, enables the taxpayer to hold onto the money for longer. Moreover, he explains that delaying income tends to not only help the taxpayer's cash flow but also significantly reduce the total amount of taxes that have to be paid.

Weil also states that a great way to reduce excessive income is to top-up one's pension plan or IRA contribution. "If you are self-employed, consider setting up a SIMPLE or 401(k) to maximise your investment while reducing your income and tax rate," he suggests. On the other hand, employed individuals should encourage their employers to maximise their contribution but they should also be aware that deductible IRA contributions will be invalidated when modified AGI (MAGI) reaches a certain threshold.

In addition, Weil explains that Roth conversions are a great way to take advantage of a year with lower than normal income. If income is nonexistent during the past year, it is highly recommended that people not let unused deductions go to waste by converting enough of the IRA to offset the unused deduction. Moreover, entrepreneurs are advised to avoid setting up a business that will most likely be classified as a hobby since businesses that show losses can help reduce taxes while allowing them to survive to profitability.

Furthermore, taxpayers are subject to a penalty if they do not make adequate estimated tax payment throughout the year. Total payment through withholding and estimated payment must be equal to the smaller of 90% of the current years taxes that will be shown on the 2019 tax return, or 100% of the prior years taxes as shown on the 2018 tax return. "If you have not made the required estimated payments, the shortage can be made up through additional withholding on wages, pension distribution and or IRA distributions to avoid the penalty. Penalties can also be reduced by showing that a greater share of the year's income was received in the last quarter of the year than in the prior quarters," says Weil.
