In the Baltimore area, their most popular roofing services offered is a flat roof, torch down membrane installation. They provide a wide range of material options, including modified bitumen roofing, EPDM rubber roofing, spray polyurethane foam roofing, and thermoplastic membranes like PVC or TPO. Their team of roofing experts are ready to help educate and advise homeowners on the best flat roofing type for their Baltimore rowhome, based on their budget and performance expectations.

Torch down is a cost effective way to weather seal a flat roof without breaking the bank. When properly installed, torch down roofing can protect your home for several years before a new layer will need to be applied. The roofers at McHenry have been installing torch down flat roofing since starting the company. Their experience and expertise allow them to guarantee quality roofing that will stand up to the elements for years to come.

Unlike torch down roofing, rubber roofs are a more expensive investment that will last longer in Baltimore?s harsh winters. Rubber roofs are made up of the same materials that are used to produce tires for cars. It is thicker and more durable than modified bitumen roofing with warranties that last over 10 years. McHenry roofing typically recommends this type of flat roofing if it is within the homeowner?s budget.

A spokesperson for McHenry Roofing says, ?We?re proud to be able to offer roofing services for rowhomes and single family homes across the Baltimore areas. Once you give us a call we will provide you an over-the-phone estimate using satellite imaging. These images provide us the ability to price out materials and labor instantaneously based on the size and dimensions of your home. Homeowners in single family homes may prefer their architectural asphalt shingle offering, which is better suited for pitched roofs. This material is inexpensive and extends the life of the roof.
