Seattle, WA: Raymark Plumbing & Sewer, a local plumber in Seattle, is providing some insight on Seattle City water. Seattle is well known for its high-quality water and abundance of rain. In fact, Seattle's drinking water originates from snowmelt in the Cascade Mountains, just east of the city, and then flows into the Cedar and Tolt rivers.

After that, chlorine, fluoride, and other water quality treatments are provided at the Cedar and Tolt facilities to help ensure Seattle's drinking water safety.

The Cedar and Tolt River watersheds are now protected water habitats. Subsequently, practices that contribute to sediment and erosion have been discontinued. For example, old logging roads in the area have been allowed to grow back or are decommissioned, improving the watershed quality. Conservation programs allow the rivers to continuously supply clean drinking water to Seattle residents. In addition, conservation supports Seattle's native salmon, lakes, and locks.

Water conservation programs also help Seattle residents become aware of where their water comes from and how to use less. The Cedar River Watershed Education Center provides opportunities to learn more about Seattle's water and over 9,000 years of human habitat in the Seattle area.

Raymark Plumbing & Sewer encourages residents to learn more about their water and to protect their homes from uncontained water. Providing plumbing in Seattle is a passion for the company as they are Seattle natives and have served the community for over 40 years.
