August 18, 2015 -

Smart Kitchen is now providing online chef courses, giving consumers an easy and affordable way to learn cooking. The company offers courses that cost much less than traditional chef schools, but still teach the same basic principles. Courses are offered at beginner, intermediate, and advanced levels.

Perry Herst of smartkitchen.com released a statement about the company's courses: "They're so much more affordable than traditional learning. Honestly, you get to gain the knowledge and skills you need to become a chef for a fraction of the cost of culinary school."

Studies of popular culinary institutes show that most chef certifications can cost upwards of $20,000 to obtain. College degrees require even more, with an associate's degree costing upwards of $30,000 for the two-year instruction, and a bachelor's degree costing as much as twice that amount.

Smart Kitchen offers an affordable alternative, while still providing the instruction needed to become a chef. Online classes are more flexible than those provided by traditional classrooms, and many students who have families or who work full time find that online chef courses can be much more convenient.

Benny is a student and a father of three who learned to cook online with Smart Kitchen. He says, "It was much easier for me to do online learning. Between work and family, I wouldn't have had time to even consider furthering my career if I had to attend regular classes. Online learning is honestly the best thing that's ever happened."

Smart Kitchen currently offers a seven-day free trial. Would-be chefs are encouraged to sign up for free for seven days. At the end of the trial period, if they are not impressed with the courses offered and the skills taught, they can cancel their subscription and owe nothing. "It's just one more way that we make things affordable," says Perry Herst.

Smart Kitchen offers more than 500 hours of cooking instruction, including a wide number of recipes, tips, and more than 250 basic techniques. The courses use the same teaching method implemented to teach world renowned chefs. All of these are provided in an online platform that makes it easier and more affordable for people to learn cooking.
