For nearly 20 years, IQphoto has been the top wedding photography studio in San Francisco, having helped hundreds of couples immortalize their special day. As the studio says, ?When you choose your wedding photographer, you are not just buying a service?you are investing in memories.? As such, it is important to ensure these memories are captured by a professional who knows what they are doing. This is why a photographer must be carefully selected in order to make sure that they have the talent needed to capture meaningful and artistic images on one?s wedding day.

One can choose from any of IQphoto?s many styles and packages. The traditional style of wedding photography, for example, is very popular among San Francisco couples looking to have photos of their wedding taken. The traditional style is known to give one a sense of familiarity when looking at the photos as this style has been reproduced by multiple photographers over the years. It is known to include a number of carefully posed photos taken at important moments during the event. These events might include the exchange of vows or the kiss or any of a dozen small but crucial moments during the day. Anyone looking for a pre-planned set of photos taken during the most important moments throughout the day will find that this style of photography offers exactly what they need.

Documentary wedding photography, or wedding photojournalism, offers a more candid approach to wedding photography. ?Wedding photojournalism gives you a series of unique images aimed to ?tell the story? of your wedding day,? says IQphoto. The photography style has a number of drawbacks, however. The lack of a pre-planned shot list means that everyone is left to rely on the photographer?s instincts, and the fact that the shots are not planned opens up the possibility of there being only bad lighting available.

A combination of traditional and wedding photojournalism produces editorial wedding photography. ?The editorial style has wedding photographers place the subjects in certain settings to take advantage of good lighting, specific location or backgrounds,? the studio says. ?Then, once the scene is set, the couple and their party are free to be themselves, and this results in a more spontaneous feel. Unlike the photojournalistic style, editorial photography takes advantage of the photographer?s artistic judgment rather than capturing a series of moments. This style is often used by SF City Hall wedding photographers. However, when it comes to capturing decisive moments, this style cannot be used.?

The studio has earned a number of awards for the great work they have done. Many of their clients have left great reviews of the studio?s services as well. One client left a highly positive review online, saying, ?There will never be enough words to express my gratitude to IQphoto, especially to Joseph, for our wedding photography. We were fortunate enough to get Joseph for both of our nights. It was the best thing that could have happened! He was extremely professional, kind and artistic as heck! He also offered us a free City Hall session (mini engagement session), which was not part of our contract at all! Joseph truly has an eye for photography! I hope he enjoyed our company as much as we enjoyed his. The photos came out great (far better than we could have imagined). Mark, the second photographer, was also very sweet and talented! Honestly, do not think twice about going with Joseph! He will capture all of your special moments in a very unique way! Love seeing our engagement and wedding photos!?
