Darryl James, speaking on behalf of James Martial Arts Academy, says, "We have had continually growing demand for more classes from those who have learned that martial arts is a great way to get into shape that also helps them in many other areas of their lives. In particular, many have asked for Kajukenbo, a hybrid martial art from Hawaii that combines Karate, Judo and Jujutsu, Kenpo and Boxing, which helps both women and men develop defensive skills quickly.

"We are also offering Kosho-Ryu Kenpo-jujutsu, another balanced self-defensive martial art for those who want to become proficient in defensive tactics. It also helps our students develop a mindset that they can and will defend themselves?this is particularly important for women who want to understand situational awareness and risk assessment as well as which verbal and psychological strategies they can use. Full details can be found on our website, or you can call us to speak to someone in confidence too.?"

The Academy was recently featured on the USA Today news site in an article that explores how adults are learning new skills by turning to martial arts training for both self-defense and fitness. James is quoted saying, "Martial arts is far more than just kicking, self-defense, punching and getting the next colorful belt, it's about developing confidence, discipline, character, focus and respect." According to the article, the Academy ensures that every class supports growth in mind, body, and character. James goes on to say that their programs can help any student reach the next level, regardless of their experience or age, with the help of the Academy's experienced trainers and proven techniques. The Academy strives to help each student reach their fitness and martial arts goals with challenging classes.

Notably, many students have left reviews online praising their time with the Academy's instructors. Everett Winston, who has taken up Kajukenbo and Kosho-Ryu and gives the Academy 5-Stars in their Google review, says, "I'm so glad I found this dojo and Sifu DJ. I feel great after every class, filled with his knowledge on the arts of Kajukenbo and Kosho-Ryu. The fees are reasonable, and the classes are three days a week. The adult classes are awesome! I just wish I would have found him sooner."
