Futurepace Tech LLC, a company based in Valley Cottage, New York, is showing its support for UK based Selfridges & Co's "Project Ocean," an environmental cause that aims to reduce plastic consumption as a way to protect the ocean from the many harmful effects of plastic disposal.

Selfridges' "Project Ocean" is currently on its fifth year of raising awareness of the harm plastic does to the Earth's oceans. Since its inception in 2010, Selfridges has been trying to address the problem of plastic consumption, as reports have shown that almost 400 million tons of plastic have been used per year worldwide. According to http://www.selfridges.com/GB/en/content/project-ocean, only 10% of used plastic is recycled. As a result, Project Ocean has started to remove all single-use water bottles from their Foodhalls and restaurants, amounting to approximately 400,000 bottles per year. More statistics can be found on http://www.zsl.org/conservation/habitats/marine-and-freshwater/project-ocean.

Selfridges' environmental cause has pushed several companies to follow suit and contribute to the project. Among them is Futurepace Tech LLC, a company that specializes in creating reusable, ecological products that support active and healthy lifestyles. One of its products is the stainless steel insulated water bottle, a product that the company is currently selling on Amazon USA, and is now available in UK and Europe. "By creating simple products, we are doing our part to protect the environment," Nelson, the company's marketing assistant, said. "Our water bottles contribute to solving the growing problem of excessive plastic consumption, leading to problematic plastic disposal that affects our oceans. By using our product, customers are helping the environment."

The company's 20 ounce insulated water bottle can keep beverages hot for almost eight hours and cold for 24 hours. The product is made from durable materials, and is lightweight, easy-to-carry, spill-proof, and leak proof. As of the moment, the product is gaining strong positive feedback from customers who have purchased the product on Amazon.

Futurepace Tech LLC continues to create products that promote environmental awareness. The company's support for Project Ocean and other environmental causes will only continue to strengthen, as consumers become environmentally aware and start to do their part in helping the environment.
