August 21, 2015 - PRESSADVANTAGE -

Dunloor, a business based in Lindfield, NSW, Australia, has recently launched the Jeeves GPS tracker. The tracker has been designed for those people who worry that their partners are not being entirely truthful. The gadget is for those who want to make sure they can find out the truth, even if the truth may be painful. Details about the tracker are available on <http://jeevesgpstracker.com/>.

"We live in an era where amazing technology is available and it is about time we started using it to our benefit," says Emily Baxter from Dunloor. "For those who are worried about their partner's actions and need to know what is happening, they can covertly place the small GPS tracker in their partner's car and follow their every movement. A word of warning: people must be prepared to deal with the truth when it comes out."

The GPS tracker has been designed to monitor the movement of whoever carries it. It has been used for pets and children, as well as for elderly relatives. Others leave it in their vehicles so that they are able to find out its location if it gets stolen. The tracker is highly compact and has a long life rechargeable battery. It also comes with a unique smartphone app to track movement. Dunloor offers a number of different packages that people can take up with the app, which are three, six and 12 month connection plans.

The company also encourages all customers to like them on Facebook at <https://www.facebook.com/GPSTrackersnow>. This is an opportunity to find out about further special offers, as well as to ask questions about how to best use the device. Essentially, it is an opportunity to share stories about how the tracker has been used.

Unfortunately, statistics continue to show that infidelity is very common, both with men and women. Furthermore, divorce rates continue to be high and many marriages end because of infidelity. While the GPS tracker does not have the ability to stop infidelity from happening, it is able to show if it is indeed occurring, which may give some couples the chance to resolve their differences and possibly save their marriage.
