April 17, 2020 -

The Savannah Law Office of Kenneth S. Nugent, P.C. has become known as one of the more reliable personal injury representation options in the area. That?s why it came as no surprise to many when they recently announced they would still be available to handle personal injury legal claims regardless of the ongoing COVID-19 crisis. Despite the challenges that operating during a pandemic presents to any type of law firm, Kenneth S. Nugent, P.C. ? Savannah staff members say they are ready to tackle these challenges head-on.

Firm representative, Tim Derrickson, added this on the matter, ?These are tough times for everyone across the United States. It?s also a time that demands extra precautions to be taken. Our firm is well-aware of these things but we also recognize the fact that people will still need legal representation on personal injury and other legal issues. That?s why we have chosen to remain open to help but also to do that responsibly. We are operating as close as we can to business as usual, with some necessary safety precautions. It might feel a bit strange to our clients but they can rest assured that we are still dedicated to providing them with the most professional legal experience in the state of Georgia. We want our clients to also be aware that we are constantly evaluating news regarding the spread of the Coronavirus and are taking every possible precaution to make our firm a safe place for our employees and clients.?

Derrickson went on to say that the typical face to face consultations and legal meetings between employees and clients will no longer be able to take place. He says it has forced them to do all of their communication by phone or by using various forms of online communication. This includes the use of such video call platforms as Skype and Zoom which are the next best thing to meeting a client in person. The firm?s representative says they can do this because for years now they have developed electronic systems to protect and streamline their legal processes. He says they even have set up a COVID-19 task force that is relentlessly focused on providing uninterrupted services to their clients. This task force has enabled the entire staff to now work remotely and has put additional security measures in place to protect their client?s sensitive data from ransomware and systems hackers. The personal injury attorney Savannah representative also said that all of this has been done to keep their clients and employees safe by limiting their need to travel outside of their homes. Derrickson admitted that everyone at the firm will miss the personal touch that face to face meetings brings to their legal services. He added that they feel what they have put in place best serves the needs of their clients, employees, and their community at this time.

The firm?s representative also wanted to make it clear that everyone that comes to them for legal help during this unusual time will still get the same staunch legal representation that the firm is well-known for. They will also be conducting such time-sensitive legal tasks as accident investigations and securing insurance coverage for victims of personal injury incidents where medical expenses are starting to pile up. Derrickson shared this Google Review that shows how dedicated the firm is to meeting their clients? legal needs no matter what conditions they have to operate under. In this review, Michelle Withers states, ?I had the best team working on my case. Any questions or concerns I had they answered. And, they kept me abreast of everything with my case. I will recommend to family and friends. Thank you.?
