LowCountry Home Magazine, the Leading Media Company in Bluffton, SC, features the rising trend for multigenerational homes in the United States of America.

A multigenerational household is defined as a home that contains two or more generations of individuals, not including teenagers or young children. Most commonly, a multigenerational home consists of adult children caring for an aging parent or other extended family members.

Recent research showed that there are nearly 64 million people, or 20% of the American population are now living in a multigenerational household. One factor of the increase is due to the rising price for senior and assisted living homes. Living facilities now cost over $4,000 per month on average or $48,000 per year.

The rising trend for multigenerational homes, however, remains beneficial for families. Multigenerational housing provides a unique opportunity for those seeking to care for parents or family members while allowing both parties to retain their independence, in a recent article published by the popular home living magazine.

The Best Modern Home Magazine in Bluffton, SC states that the benefits of moving to a multigenerational household are far beyond monetary. According to the publication, about 41% of Americans buying homes today are also considering accommodating an elderly parent or adult child.

As the demand grows, more home builders in South Carolina are also offering multigenerational home designs. While architectural design for each home may differ, its purpose remains the same: ?establishing an environment that cohesively blends the needs of both generations while fostering a sense of independence and privacy within a single home.?

One popular multigenerational home builder in SC is Southern Coastal Homes. The company designs custom homes that allow families to care for one another in their later years. They work closely with each client to evaluate their unique and special requirements while optimizing the design of a custom home to suit their lifestyle.
