Hale County, Ala.- The coronavirus (COVID-19) has caused much concern for families and friends of those currently in prison or jail during this time. A Judge in Alabama, Ben Fuller, has recently ordered the release of low-level criminals due to concerns over COVID-19. Alabama Bail Bonds, a bail bondsman in Hale County, is highlighting the recent release due to the virus.

The Alabama judge made the decision as jails in the area are currently overcrowded making it the prime situation for the virus to spread. The judge is aware that many people are currently in jail due to not being able to afford bond. These people are forced to remain in jail for small crimes while awaiting their court date. Allowing people to potently die from the virus in this situation seems unethical.

This comes as recent controversy has arisen over a disagreement on bail bond laws as a whole. The judgment passed allows anyone in jail with less than a $5,000 bond to be released while awaiting their court date. Alabama Bail Bonds points out that this trend may continue across all counties in Alabama as the backlash received from the community was harsh, to say the least.

Alabama Bail Bonds wants to do all they can for the community during this time. They are happy to help answer any questions about bonds to get loved ones into the safety of their homes. Alabama Bail Bonds provides bail bond services in Hale County and numerous other counties across the state.
