Pinnacle Treatment Centers, based in Mt. Laurel Township, New Jersey, has announced that they have recently published a blog post that explains the nature of drug rehabs and how to find the best one. The article explains that a drug rehab is a treatment center that offers therapies, programs, and counseling with the goal of treating a particular addiction. The problem could be alcohol use disorder, drug abuse, or opioid use disorder (OUD), and the programs or treatment applied will depend on the particular condition being treated. The article offers guidelines for those who are interested in the best rehab center in their area.

Melanie Eilers, Senior Director of Communications at Pinnacle Treatment Centers, says, "There are various types of rehab centers; find a rehab center that treats your specific issue. For example, if you have OUD, you should look for a rehab center that offers medication-assisted treatment, counseling, and therapies for that particular disorder. Some rehab centers only offer programs for a specific addiction, while others provide treatments for a wide range of issues. You should do some research and choose the one in which you are most comfortable. And if you're asking, 'how do I find the best drug rehab near me?,' you should seek the advice of a professional to guide you along this challenging journey and to help you find the most appropriate rehab center."

These treatment centers are designed to offer hope, assistance, and care required by people who have an addiction, allowing them to overcome it and make positive changes in their lives by adapting certain behaviors. These behaviors include impulse control, healthy coping skills, emotional control skills, drug refusal techniques. However, for a drug rehab program to be helpful, the specific individual must really want to change his or her way of life and strive to follow the program until it is successfully completed.

It should be noted that some rehab centers are focused on a particular group of people, for instance, lawyers, executives, LGBTQs, women, etc. And it is a good idea to ask a particular rehab center as to the kind of environment and patient population that they have. It is usually advisable to choose a rehab center that has a diverse population.

It is also important to know that rehab centers can either be outpatient or inpatient. Inpatient rehab centers permit individuals to live in the facility as they receive therapies, treatments, and counseling. The advantage is that patients are better focused on their treatment as there is no external distraction. Furthermore, they are able to stay away from their previous social environment that may have contributed to the temptation to abuse a particular substance.

The outpatient rehab centers allow the individuals to continue with their usual routine, such as going to work and so on, while undergoing treatments on a part time basis. This may be a good choice for busy people but it will also depend on the kind of addiction that the person has. Some centers focus on just one type of program, whether inpatient or outpatient. Others are able to provide both types. And then there is also the important issue of budget. Some facilities just offer basic amenities but some also offer luxurious amenities.

Statistics show that a drug rehab program can be the best way to overcome an addiction. This is because 73 percent of inpatients have been able to complete their treatment and approximately 21 percent of those who completed had remained sober after five years.

For outpatient treatments, 43 percent of the patients were able to finish the program successfully, of which approximately 18 percent of them remained sober after five years.

It should be noted, however, that there are other factors determining the success of a program, aside from remaining sober. These include less frequent use of the substance; improvements to the person's personal life, education and work; improvements in physical and mental health; lower crimes committed in connection with the addiction; and less trauma and damage to the patient and other people around them.
