La Mesa, California based All Systems Go Marketing is reaching out to the community to share information on some of the most common mistakes in social media marketing that businesses can make. In particular, they wish to explain how these mistakes can be avoided.

With the phenomenal rise of social media and its widened role in commerce, these platforms that used to be associated only with entertainment and leisure time have evolved into a battleground for digital marketing efforts among competing companies. With several millions of daily users all around the world, marketing with local SEO as well as social media, has become one of the most effective ways to advertise a product or service, leading companies from virtually every country to try and attract a portion of the daily traffic of potential customers that visit these sites.

This is a task that takes a significant amount of effort and resources, and one that does not come with any guarantees of success. It is with this in mind that the local marketing company decided to share their expertise and advice on their article titled, "Avoid These Mistakes in Social Media Marketing." Craig Wright, a representative of All Systems Go Marketing, says, "While advertising your company on social media platforms may seem easy at first, this is far from the truth. As unfair as it may seem, you could potentially pour all of your time, effort, and money into a campaign without it delivering any significant results. There are several things that you need to avoid if you want to find success with your marketing efforts, and we'll give you a rundown of the most important ones."

The first mistake to avoid, as described in the article posted by the company, is needlessly focusing their efforts on reaching the percentage of customers who may be interested in their product or services. Rather than concentrating their efforts on potential customers alone, many business owners should try to reach out to a broader audience in the hopes of attracting new customers across multiple platforms. As a result, they will attract people who may or may not be interested in the first place, rather than those who genuinely need their product or service alone.

Wright clarifies, however, "You should define your target audience within the first stages of your social media marketing campaign. This should help you focus all of your efforts and achieve better results than you otherwise would have, as there is no use in reaching people who would not be interested in your product in the first place."

Another common social media marketing mistake that companies make is not giving enough importance to interacting and engaging with their customers. Aside from chatting with and responding to their customers' comments and reviews, All Systems Go Marketing states that business owners should attempt to engage with them through polls, contests and regular status updates. These interactions and posts go a long way in terms of attracting new customers as well as keeping the current ones interested.

Sharing interesting and meaningful content also helps in the next topic that the company touches upon. Wright says, "You want to share things that are valuable and interesting to your customers, as this will encourage them to share this information with their own network of friends. This may generate interest in some of their acquaintances, creating new followers as a result who may turn into new clients as well."

All Systems Go Marketing also advises their readers to avoid buying influence to increase the growth of their page, as synthetic reviews and followers could discourage new customers. Partnering with other companies (with products that complement, or go well with the ones that they already offer) and treating the marketing campaign as a team effort will bear better results, helping establish the brand and creating awareness. This helps make tackling new opportunities an easier endeavor, producing better results as well for both members of the collaboration.
