All Systems Go Marketing, an HVAC-focused digital marketing firm based in La Mesa, California, has announced that they have recently published a blog post describing how the novel coronavirus has been the biggest disruption for online marketing. The article points out that in both on-ground and online marketing, major technology events had to be canceled and technology giants like Apple, Facebook, and Uber had revealed that their revenues will likely experience a drastic decline due to much lower demand for their products and problems with their supply chain that has to do with China, where the virus had originated.

Craig Wright, owner of All Systems Go Marketing, says, ?In the digital marketing field, COVID-19 has substantially impacted ad revenues. In fact, Facebook and Google have been predicted by industry analysts that they will suffer from decreases in their ad revenues. Indeed, the fear and uncertainty that is being experienced in the real world are also affecting the ecosystem of the digital world. What digital marketers will have to deal with now is how this crisis will continue to affect the industry in the long run, as there seems to be no end in sight for this health crisis.?

The retail industry, both online and brick and mortar stores, have been severely affected by COVID-19 because their supply chains have mostly shut down. The factors in China has not yet gone back to full operations, which has been further aggravated by the tariff policies of the Trump administration that have been enforced since 2019. Initially, it was surmised that e-commerce may be able to take advantage of the situation as most people would be staying home rather than going to stores. Unfortunately, it did not happen because the manufacture of goods has been affected as most factories in China have not yet returned to full operations. Furthermore, the logistics and delivery of online order have been severely impacted with goods ordered online likely to arrive late.

With nobody being certain as to when the health issue will end companies are uncertain with regards to their digital and content marketing budgets. And spending for online marketing will likely take an even bigger hit if the COVID-19 situation worsens. Meanwhile, HVAC companies will need to be always ahead of their competition and this is possible by maximizing their SEO campaigns. This is where All Systems Go Marketing
