Online Dermatology Can Help with Skin Problems Resulting from Spending Time Outdoors

June 17, 2020 - PRESSADVANTAGE -

Walk-in Dermatology, based in Greenvale, New York, has revealed that online dermatology consultations may help in the treatment of skin problems resulting from spending time outdoors, whether it's sunburn, sun spots, allergies, or insect bites. With the summer season having started and after being cooped up indoors for a long time as a result of the Covid-19 pandemic, many people who are eager to go outdoors might spend too much time under the summer sun and may suffer from various skin conditions. They may suffer from sunburn or rashes if they get too close to certain plants. Aside from the plants, insects may also bite and trigger allergies. And prolonged exposure to ultraviolet radiation may also cause more serious problems, such as skin cancer. Skin cancer can have serious consequences and early diagnosis is essential. Fortunately, this is possible with online dermatology.

Stacey Brisman, MD, FAAD, from Walk-in Dermatology, says, "COVID-19 has triggered a rapid increase in the use of telehealth. Not just because it's convenient, but because it works. About 11 percent of US consumers used telehealth last year for their medical care. Through the first half of 2020 that rate spiked to 46 percent of consumers who are now using telehealth as a substitute for in-office medical visits. Whether you develop a painful sunburn this summer, a rash, or you notice troubling spots on your skin, an online dermatology visit provides the care you need right away.?

Stacey Brisman wants to stress that there are three primary advantages offered by online dermatology consultations. First is effectiveness. Teledermatology services can allow doctors to offer effective care that might be possible for certain patients because of travel restrictions, geographic distance, or concerns regarding social distancing. Studies have demonstrated that online dermatology is an appropriate and an efficient way to serve patients who might otherwise not be able to receive care. Another important benefit is that online dermatology saves time. There would be no need to wait for several weeks or even months to be seen by a board-certified dermatologist. This is essential for serious skin conditions where an early diagnosis is vital in the treatment and in saving lives. Furthermore, online dermatology may provide a beneficial domino effect by reducing treatment costs, decreasing follow-up visits, and reducing the number of undetected cases. The result is less demand on the healthcare system because early diagnosis and treatment will result into better patient outcomes and lesser medical costs.

And the third essential advantage of online dermatology is reduced costs. It allows fast access to services so that dermatologists are able to provide a timely diagnosis. Also, this will allow the dermatologist to focus on patient who require further care, while decreasing the administrative expenses required to run a clinic, while fighting the shortage of board-certified dermatologists in the US. The end result of all that is better outcomes for patients.

Stacey Brisman points out, "The good news is you don't have to look far for high-quality online dermatology services. Many traditional dermatology practices have adopted telehealth as part of their patient care strategy. The pandemic may have been the catalyst behind the boom in online dermatology, but patients are making sure teledermatology is here to stay."

Both physicians and patients are reporting high demand and high satisfaction rates with the use of telehealth apps in various medical fields. Dermatology, because of its visual nature, is naturally suitable to telehealth.
