School of Boabom Arts Aims to Help Participants Deal With Stress During Covid-19 Pandemic.

Brookline, Massachusetts ? The Boston School of Boabom, a community of teachers specializing in the Boabom Arts, today announced that it has begun offering a free weekly online meditation class. Taking place every Saturday at 11 AM, the hour-long guided meditation is designed to help participants deal with stress and anxiety during the Covid-19 pandemic.

?These are very unsettling times for many people,? said Yemado, director of the school. ?We hope that by offering this free online meditation session we can help dissipate some of the stress and uncertainty people are experiencing because of the Covid-19 pandemic. We also hope to introduce meditation to anyone who would like to feel more centered and present and is curious about how to apply meditation in their daily life.?

Yemado leads the meditation session, which is available via a Zoom link. Participants should register for the event through the website. While the meditation is free, participants are welcome to give a donation to the school.

Meditation incorporates breathing, visualizing, and sound to help practitioners feel more present in the moment, diffuse stress, and connect with their inner self. The meditation session is in-line with the school's other teachings of the Boabom Arts, an ancient form of no-contact, non-competitive martial arts with roots in ancient Tibet.

Currently, all Boabom classes are being offered online via Zoom to keep within Massachusetts' guidelines regarding Covid-19. Normally classes are conducted at the school's Brookline location in both group and private sessions.

"We look forward to fully conducting in-person classes again once it is safe to do so," said Yemado. "Though we do plan to continue with on-line and hybrid classes whenever we do reopen our studio. We hope the public takes advantage of these free meditation sessions to ease their stress and anxiety levels."
