Spousal maintenance, often referred to as ?alimony? is awarded to women who are stay at home mothers. Changes in society and the increase in the number of dual income households have forced the courts to re-evaluate the concept, and courts now need to ensure that they examine the unique financial situation of each divorcing couple instead of relying on outdated notions of gender roles that are rarely still relevant. While some couples may, in fact, still live within these gender roles, it is important for the courts to forego any assumptions and account for a variety of lifestyles.

There are different kinds of spousal maintenance which are applied in different situations. Temporary spousal maintenance, often referred to as rehabilitative maintenance, is awarded for a specific time frame in order to assist in the education, job training and skills of the receiving party so that they can work towards supporting themselves in the future. Permanent spousal maintenance is awarded for an indefinite amount of time, usually when the marriage can be considered ?long term.? It is usually awarded in cases where the receiving spouse is not capable of self-support (based on what they earned while married).
