The company recently published an article on their website that explores this exact subject, and Austin residents who are considering the future sale of their homes are encouraged to read this article if they are unsure where to begin. According to the company, a lack of experience selling a property should not hold them back from understanding all the options they have at their disposal, provided they seek advice from a reliable and knowledgeable source.

Written by Jack Rady of HUD512 Austin House Buyers, the post explains, ?It?s been said that selling your home can be more stressful than many other major life events. When you?re under duress and need to sell quickly, additional strain is added to the mix. We?ll help you by exploring your options when selling your Austin house.?

The first option explored in the article is selling a house with the aid of a professional listing agent. This is the best known and most conventional method of selling a house, according to Rady, and this in turn means that it is likely to be what homeowners consider first if they decide they want to sell their house. As most readers will know, agents earn a commission based on the sale price of the house, but this fee may be only one of several, depending on a variety of factors (such as whether they provide any additional services). This path also means that the homeowner?s asking price will be affected by market conditions, especially in what Rady calls, ?this demand-driven market.?

Furthermore, the homeowner is unlikely to get any assistance with making the house fit for sale ? their agent may make recommendations regarding its renovation or upkeep, but any resources needed to carry out repairs or spruce up the property will probably have to come from the homeowner?s own pocket. Among a host of other stress-inducing obstacles, the main issue with using a letting agent is that the homeowner may eventually come to closing talks with a potential buyer only to discover that they no longer wish to purchase the property, do not qualify for the mortgage, etc. In practice, this means that a house can spend months or even years (in worst case scenarios) on the market before it is sold. Next, the article discusses cash offers. Given that professional buyers offer cash for the properties they wish to purchase, property owners can expect to close the sale in a short period. Furthermore, the buyer will usually be ready to accept the house in whatever condition it presently is in, which ultimately plays to the homeowner?s advantage as they will not have to invest either their time or money into fixing up the property prior to sale.

According to the article, one crucial aspect of using cash offers is that it, ?alleviates you of the legal responsibilities associated with disclosure. Professional buyers are taking higher risks, offer faster cash sales, and usually pay the closing costs. For these reasons, their offers are usually lower than properties sold as FSBO or listed on the MLS.? The downside here is that not all professional buyers are created equal, and dishonest individuals may try to take advantage of the homeowner if they spot a potential weakness (such as the need to make a quick sale due to financial emergencies).
