The Angell Law Firm, LLC, a firm based in Atlanta, Georgia, has announced that they have recently published a blog post that explains the common injuries from a rear-end collision. Rear-end collisions are regarded as "fender benders" but they still can result in a lot of damage, even if the crash occurs at a speed of 10 mph. It is common for the driver and the car occupants to sustain neck and soft tissue injuries, among others.

Whiplash is the most common type of injury that may result from a rear-end collision. This is not actually that surprising because the sudden and violent movement of the head and neck can cause significant strain to the muscles of the neck, head, and back. This occurs when the muscles are in a relaxed state. The muscles are relaxed because the victim didn't have a chance to brace for impact. According to the National Safety Council, 80 percent of those who incurred whiplash injury, experienced soreness and pain for more than a week, while 50 percent of them suffered from pain and soreness for over a year.

Symptoms of soft tissue injuries may include neck pain, pain in the shoulder blades, dizziness, headaches, and possibly vision impairment. It should be noted that because of the adrenaline rush during a car accident, the symptoms may not start to become apparent until weeks after the accident. Those who would like to learn more about car accidents, their common causes, and possible injuries and impact on victims can check out the firm's website.

Another common injury that could result from a rear-end collision is a concussion. This is due to the brain hitting the inside of the skull, resulting in bruising and tissue compression. Victims of a rear-end collision should be observed for possible symptoms of concussion for at least 24 hours after the accident. The primary symptoms to look for are nausea and loss of balance. Other possible symptoms include blurred vision, dizziness, headaches, sensitivity to sounds and light, and inability to concentrate.

Rear-end collisions can also result into serious back injuries. The force of the collision may be sufficient to compress the discs and the spine in the lower back, which may lead to soreness and excruciating low back pain. If it is severe enough, it may even result into spinal cord paralysis. A herniated disc may also result when the outer fiber that surrounds a disc is ruptured or torn as a result of the trauma. Severe herniation may cause numbness, back pain, tingling, and paralysis.

Head and brain injuries commonly result from rear-end collisions. Traumatic brain injuries may result and the usual symptoms include: loss of consciousness, dizziness, chronic fatigue, abnormal changes in behavior, impaired speech, and reduced cognitive performance. Broken bones and compound fractures may also be caused by the accident and lead to prolonged health complications, such as internal injuries and secondary infections.

With such injuries as a result of a rear-end collision, victims need to hire an experienced personal injury attorney to handle the legal process to help them get the compensation that they deserve. In this, the lawyers from The Angell Law Firm are ready to help.
