While they often occur at a different pace to everywhere else, change and progress do indeed take place in the small towns of Virginia. Environmental care is one area that has experienced significant change over the past few years, for instance, as locals take steps to adopt more eco-conscious practices that protect the environment. Tree removal services were not exempt from these changes, and what were considered common practice a few years ago are now obsolete, unsafe and seen as harmful to the environment. However, such changes have led West Point residents to debate how they should go about removing a tree in the future.

Philip Wood of Steadfast Tree Care states, "You can encounter a lot of trouble for removing a tree without doing the proper research beforehand, no matter how easy the task may seem. Any homeowner would want a successful tree removal. That means carrying out a tree removal project that is both accident-free and leaves your yard looking great. Experts are sure to give you a reliable assessment of the task, but the question is how you can guarantee such an endeavor will turn out exactly as you want it. This is the topic we cover in our latest blog post, where we explain how proper tree removal services work in the West Point area."

Wood explains that, while it may seem pretty straightforward at first, a lot of thought goes into any tree removal project. Professional tree removal companies like Steadfast Tree Care will guarantee their customer's satisfaction and a safe removal, though the company has also laid out what one can do beforehand to speed up the process. First of all, they explain that any homeowner should have a certified arborist examine the tree in question before it is removed. The tree service company needs to know the tree's length, width, branch layout and age ahead of time. Understanding the tree's condition is also essential, as different trees in different conditions will need to be removed in their own way.

Wood says, "Removing a dead or diseased tree is a very different process from removing a healthy one. Healthier trees are well rooted, so they might be more difficult to remove. Likewise, removing a young tree is not the same as removing an old one. Only a certified arborist can evaluate and assess the best and safest way to remove the tree, including which tools should be used. They can even estimate how long the process will take."

Once an expert's opinion has been sought, the company adds that the next step is to prepare the area surrounding the tree for the removal. Anything that can be shifted away should be relocated to avoid being damaged during the removal process. Additionally, it is also advisable to clear the paths around or surrounding the tree. The estimated height of the tree can be used to clear the area as much as possible. This is a crucial part of the process, though the company explains that even in cases in which the tree is too close to a building, it is still possible to have it removed.

"If such a tree is too close to your building and can't be cleared, there's still a way out. Tree removal companies use ropes to climb and cut off the tree in bits till the height is sufficiently reduced to cut it from the bottom. This will depend on the natural leaning angle of the tree, its height and many other factors. You will need to rely on an expert company to carry out the process. Luckily for you, we don't say no to any project at Steadfast Tree Care," clarifies Wood.
