WorkatHomeTruth founder Paul Schlegel of Richmond Heights, Missouri, recently addressed problems encountered with Google Sniper reviews through a post on RealScam.com. Schlegel provides work at home research to check out potential scams and warn those looking for legitimate work from home jobs about opportunities that may be a bit shady.

According to Schlegel, Google Sniper, which is an affiliate marketing training program, worked well at the start and also received a large number of positive reviews. Unfortunately, later versions of the program failed to indicate which parts are already outdated. Meanwhile, the main problem with the reviews is that it is difficult to determine which Google Sniper review to trust as many reviewers are actually shills for the affiliate training program. On the other hand, there are people who legitimately find the program to have good points.

Schlegel, who established WorkAtHomeTruth to check out home business ideas and serve as a guide to people are considering extra income ideas, noted that it is difficult to immediately dismiss the said affiliate training program. He explains, "The problem is that if you take out the outdated parts of the product, it can still work." Thus, he is conducting further research into this course.

The post on RealScam.com by Schlegel is designed to get honest reviews from others who have used the program. He is asking for both positive and negative reviews, so that an informed and lively debate can follow. He stated, "There is a lot of information from both sides and it's important when researching work at home programs to ensure what works and what doesn't. It may just take some time before we know for certain that this one is a winner."

One reason Schlegel states that it may take a while is that there are various different versions of the program, in addition to several complaints as well as reviews, some which are real and some which are not. He plans to leave a wiki up, allowing those interested to check back to see what has been added. The most relevant information will be taken into account and put into the forum discussion on the site.
